As he roll d incoherently on, for the pow r Of removing some parts one could wish. Then verbose in His language he was, and shirk d toil in composing; That is, in composing as real poets should, For think aught of mere quantity I never could. See, the prater Crispinus now dares me to try My skill with his, and 3 for the smallest sum I Like to stake. Cries he: Take now your tablets in hand, And then I will take mine; nay, at once, I demand 1 See heading to Satire X. 3 The words of Crispinus, For the smallest sum I like to stake, imply that he felt so sure of victory, that he would stake much more than his adversary if necessary. That a place, time, and umpires be given us two, Then I ll see if I cannot write much more than you. While, like wind fetter d fast in the bellows of leather, That whistles and struggles to burst from its tether, While the masses of metal grow soft in the fire, --Sounds the speech that you choose to adopt and admire. Why, e en garrulous Fannius thinks he is blest, Just because his friends offer unask d a book-chest And a bust f of himself, while there is not a man Who will look...
