Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from The Relation of the City to Its Food Supply: Report of a Committee of the National Municipal League, November 19, 1914 The relation of the twentieth century city to its food supply differs in practically every prime essential from the relation of the nineteenth century village to its food supply. The marvelous development of trans-continental and oceanic freight facilities has made the world the city s garden patch and the sea its harbor. The development of cold storage and warehouse facilities has placed the city nearer to the farm a thousand miles away than was the farm within sight of the city s buildings a quarter of a century ago. The information as to crop and harvest conditions, secured by wholesale commission houses, has led to stability in wholesale price and has placed the surplus output of every region and practically every clime at the beck and call of the city dweller who can pay the price. The practice of diversion of shipments, or selling in transit, by which a carload of grain or produce can be diverted en route to a point where local prices are higher than at the point of original shipment, is symbolic at once of the fluidity and stability of the twentieth century food supply. The big fact about the food for the twentieth century city is the diversity of its supply. This diversity in food supply means that a city can now be located wherever specialization warrants without suffering from untoward prices or other dangers formerly inherent in distance from the base of supply. This diversity means, too, not only specialization in cities, but specialization in farming countries as...
