Excerpt: . . . of her illness left the way open for thoughts of love. Some intangible association in his mind of the white roses with which I decked myself on the evening of Mrs. Savilles party, with the Southern roses which his mother loved, was enough to forge the first link in the chain, --and who can explain the ways by which love goes toward its mark, or tell why and whither it is sent Aunt Eleanor noted his attentions with approval. -With that comfortable assurance which older people frequently display in arranging the lives of young persons for their own good, she had already settled the matter in her own mind. Any girl might feel honoured by the attentions of a man like Mr. Armstrong, she assured me severely one afternoon, when she detected me in deliberately hiding myself to avoid an invitation to walk with that gentleman. A little snubbing wont hurt him any, I answered, flippantly. Hes a man who takes an awful lot for granted, auntie; besides, doesnt it strike you that hes a little old He isnt much more than forty years old, --a man in the very prime of life, a man with a future before him, she said, in her most impressive manner. And one behind him, too, I suggested, mischievously. Thats just what I object to I wonder that such a man can see anything to admire in a chit like you, Aunt Eleanor went on, raising her voice...
