You do not meet with a box like that in these times, and indeed it had belonged to Uncle Arnold when he was a little boy, and he had had it fitted up with all the same kind of paints and materials that had been in it when it was first given to him. There were six camel s-hair brushes in quills, with black sticks to fit into them, and three red sable brushes as well; a little cut-glass tub for the water; a plump round black stick of Indian ink, decorated with golden Chinese letters, lying in a compartment made for himself; and two shells, one of gold, and the other of silver, lying underneath the tray that held the colours. Then there was a palette, with three compartments to it, so that the colours should not get mixed together when you rubbed them, and each colour had a little place to rest in by itself, with a name under it. All the good old colours were there--scarlet red, vermilion, Prussian blue, carmine, emerald green, crimson lake, two or three chrome yellows, all looking brighter than each other, and a cake of green bice, which was enough to make you bilious to look at it. Uncle Arnold spent the afternoon with Bobby, showing him how to mix up the paints, and paint some old Graphic pictures, and such fine fun they had, that Bobby determined to go out..
